Most introverts hear the phrase, "you're so quiet" countless times. People love to point out our wordless ways. As a matter of fact, just this past week, someone said to me "You know, you're a really quiet girl." Yes ...

Some extroverts assume that they can easily take advantage of quiet people. This isn't true. Quiet people have a well-developed sense of their own value. If anyone tries to fob them off with the boring and less prestigious jobs they will rebel. It isn't wise to do this anyway as quiet people's insights can be extremely

Dr. Marti Olsen Laney, in her 2002 book, The Introvert Advantage: How Quiet People Can Thrive In An Extrovert World, has a similar explanation. She writes, essentially, that introverts are more sensitive than extroverts to dopamine. As a result, introverts simply need less of it to feel its pleasant effects. Too much dopamine, and introverts get overstimulated.

Allow yourself plenty of time to process all that you're learning and experiencing. With all of the input you're getting, you need plenty of quiet time to synthesize it — especially as an introvert. Listen to your intuition. Others may scoff at your “gut feelings,” but you know they haven't misled you yet.
